Cosa was thus founded in a very barren landscape. Its settlers came from areas allied with Rome, and there are only one or two hints that Etruscans were present at any time in the first two centuries of the life of the colony. The splendid polygonal masonry of its walls mirrors that of Latin towns and need hardly be attributed to local stonecutters. The immigrants were Latin-speakers whose town would have reflected their own expectations. Indeed, as Torelli has suggested, the possible dedication of the first temple to Jupiter can be seen as an expressly Latin phenomenon.¹⁴

When in May of 1948 Frank E. Brown started the excavation at Cosa, the principal aim of the project was quite simply a long-term archaeological excavation for the Classical School of the American Academy in Rome. Other institutions had had their own projects for years — the American School in Athens had just celebrated the 50th anniversary of its excavations at Corinth, while the British School in Athens had been digging at Knossos for almost as long.

These showed that the first colony was sent to Cosa in 273 B.C., seven years after the conquest of Vulci.³ A second deduction was sent at the colony's request in 197 B.C.⁴ In the late Republic, figures such as the Sestii and the Domitii Ahenobarbi owned estates in the territory.⁵ Rutilius Namatianus, sailing past in A.D. 416, noted that the city was deserted.⁶

The fifth century saw a further decline in site numbers, from 90 to 53, (41%). In a famous passage, Rutilius Namatianus, returning to Gaul from Rome in 416, records that he saw the walls of Cosa in ruins from his ship: that he risked going by sail suggests that the Via Aurelia was in bad repair. The description is precious, but inexact indeed, it is the villas that lie closest to the road that continue to survive (or to obtain proofs of their survival in the form of datable pottery): the same is true of the sites along the branch of the via Clodia which ran north to Saturnia. But other symptoms

The apogee of the villa landscape comes thus at the beginning of our period, between the mid-first century B.C. (after which no villas of this type were built), and the end of the first century A.D. 245 sites were found with sigillata italica (pers. com. E. Regoli), and of these almost half may be interpreted as villas (fig. 2: within the systematic samples 44% are villas or villages). Some new small sites were built towards the watershed, as the displaced peasantry cleared the only available land. The principal characteristic of the landscape is the villa.

This mixture of concentrated settlements and a visible element of rural dispersion was also very common in Italy – and not at all common in the Agro romano, where most settlement was apparently highly fragmented, and is almost invisible in our documentary sources.²⁹ This area is on the very edge of the Agro romano, and not far from the lands of incastellamento in the rest of Lazio, made famous by Pierre Toubert's monumental study.

First, however, it is necessary to review very briefly the evidence from the last seven years of excavation insofar as it sheds new light on the Republican colony. The excavations which started in 1990 were intended to examine the Imperial and Mediaeval phases of the town, and it was only in the last few seasons that significant new information was recovered on the first centuries of the colony's existence. Two aspects of this concern us here, the religious buildings and the planning of the forum.

Who really ruled Albano, in fact? Until the very end of our period, not its bishop, who is so evanescent in our sources; indeed, even before cardinal bishops became usually foreign (which is by the 1050s in Albano's case), I would guess that the bishop very often resided in Rome, as did other suburbicarian bishops such as those of Porto and Silva Candida, even if we do not know where.⁴⁶ The eventual 1217 papal cession of the city to the bishop makes it clear that the sedes apostolica then claimed full property rights over the city and its buildings. This cannot have been the whole
